This course explores how spaces matter for the production of gendered, racial, and other inequalities, as well as for feminist mobilization for social justice. Starting with an analysis of bodies as sites of difference, power, and politics, readings, research projects, and class activities trace feminist geographies of the UNC-CH campus, cities, and work and address migration, development, nationalism, war, and the environment with case studies from across the world. Students will build an understanding of the spatial dimensions of power, inequality, and difference and develop their capacity to assess private and public decisions that seek to address inequality.

There are no prerequisites for this course.