

GEOG 120.002: World Regional Geography

Fall 2023

Dr. Jon Lepofsky

10:10am-11:00am on Mondays, Wednesdays & Fridays

106 Fetzer Hall

On The Why of Where

“Ours is an interconnected world of travel and trade, tourism and television, a global village—but the village still has neighborhoods. Their names are Europe, South America, Southeast Asia ...”

—Harm de Blij

World Regional Geography provides an introduction to the core concepts which geographers use to understand the world. In addition to learning a lot of information and concepts related to different places and the people you could encounter there, you will learn how to think like a geographer in this course. That means doing more than just memorizing the names of locations or collecting obscure facts about various parts of the world. Thinking like a geographer means using the key conceptual tools of geography—concepts like location, place, scale, and space—to ask: why are different aspects of the world where they are? Thinking like a geographer means exploring where people and places are, and more importantly, why there.

After an overview of geography’s central concepts, you’ll spend each subsequent week learning about different world realms—what makes them unique places—and how they interact with each other—their spatial relationships. More specifically, you’ll come to know detailed information about the environmental and human-centered characteristics of the world’s major realms and what makes these realms distinct, as well as the spatial causes of cultural forms, economic development, environmental change, political structures, population dynamics, and urbanization evident in specific places. And, you’ll understand why inequities between people and places persist, how geography contributes to sustaining them, and how geography can help reduce them.

There are no prerequisites for this course.